CAPT. TONY MOSAN, the new commanding officer at the Korean Coast Guard Academy visited Cape May County and interacted with USCG members to learn about their organization and how the US Coast Guard does their jobs.

"Our Korean counterparts were very much focused on the specific science, theory and tactics that we use to develop U.S. Coast Guardsmen," said Capt. Mosan. "It’s been a great learning experience spending a lot of time in the familiar environment, or on the range or doing tasks of the faculty, they were directly observing recruit training, seeing training being done and helping to refine or improve that training. Specifically, human performance, human performance technology..." he said. "So, instead of forming refer..." he said. "Because the delegation was on base for just one day, the training needed to be broken down in a way that could be incorporated into the training process where training is divided into five distinct phases: Forming, Storming, Performing, Performing, Storming. Breaks and former refers to when the recruits first arrives at the Training Center, storming pertains to the..." Please see Issue, page A12
