Christie talked to the press at the Ocean City Boardwalk, where he signed an executive order allowing for the use of the ocean and beachfront areas for the purpose of generating revenue for the state. The governor also visited the Cape May National Historic Landmark City, where he was greeted by a crowd of more than 500 people, who watched as he signed the executive order.

Christie then traveled to Wildwood, where he met with local business owners and community leaders to discuss the future of the region. He also visited the Cape May Star and Wave newspaper, where he met with the editorial board and staff.

Later in the day, Christie visited the Cape May County Courthouse, where he met with judges and other law enforcement officials. He then visited the Cape May County Sheriff's Office, where he met with Sheriff James J. Lally and other officials.

Throughout the day, Christie was greeted by enthusiastic crowds, who praised his efforts to reopen the Jersey Shore and support local businesses. The governor's visit sent a clear message that the Jersey Shore is open for business, and that the region is ready to welcome visitors and businesses alike.
