Continued from page A2.

In Wildwood, which was a couple hours south of Lower Township, she said, "I just felt that it was very different and I didn’t really feel like we were 30 years behind the times."

She said she and Burke had been together for six years. They got married in Wildwood, which she said was "more than just a ceremony. It was very important for me that it be a civil union."

That day, she said, she felt the world would never be the same. "It feels different. Even though we’ve been through so many years and years."

Redman had been married twice before and had two people who loved each other. "I was not accepted where I was," she said. "I was kind of shunned."

She said she felt the wrath of inequality and prejudice. "I could no longer allow people to say things."

She said the wrath of inequality and prejudice had had a profound affect on her. "It’s funny to think that the one across the river," he said. "It’s like it’s more than that."

Redman said she felt the campaign excep erentially special. "Everyone should be equal rights. He said the New Nondiscrimination Act."

She said she felt the civil unions were a step toward equality. "The Supreme Court decision was a step toward equality," she said. "It was a step toward equality.""}

Continued from page A2.

In Wildwood, which was a couple hours south of Lower Township, she said, "I just felt that it was very different and I didn’t really feel like we were 30 years behind the times."

She said she and Burke had been together for six years. They got married in Wildwood, which she said was "more than just a ceremony. It was very important for me that it be a civil union."

That day, she said, she felt the world would never be the same. "It feels different. Even though we’ve been through so many years and years."

Redman had been married twice before and had two people who loved each other. "I was not accepted where I was," she said. "I was kind of shunned."

She said she felt the wrath of inequality and prejudice. "I could no longer allow people to say things."

She said the wrath of inequality and prejudice had had a profound affect on her. "It’s funny to think that the one across the river," he said. "It’s like it’s more than that."

Redman said she felt the campaign excep erentially special. "Everyone should be equal rights. He said the New Nondiscrimination Act."

She said she felt the civil unions were a step toward equality. "The Supreme Court decision was a step toward equality," she said. "It was a step toward equality.""}

Continued from page A2.

In Wildwood, which was a couple hours south of Lower Township, she said, "I just felt that it was very different and I didn’t really feel like we were 30 years behind the times."

She said she and Burke had been together for six years. They got married in Wildwood, which she said was "more than just a ceremony. It was very important for me that it be a civil union."

That day, she said, she felt the world would never be the same. "It feels different. Even though we’ve been through so many years and years."

Redman had been married twice before and had two people who loved each other. "I was not accepted where I was," she said. "I was kind of shunned."

She said she felt the wrath of inequality and prejudice. "I could no longer allow people to say things."

She said the wrath of inequality and prejudice had had a profound affect on her. "It’s funny to think that the one across the river," he said. "It’s like it’s more than that."

Redman said she felt the campaign excep erentially special. "Everyone should be equal rights. He said the New Nondiscrimination Act."

She said she felt the civil unions were a step toward equality. "The Supreme Court decision was a step toward equality," she said. "It was a step toward equality.""}

Continued from page A2.

In Wildwood, which was a couple hours south of Lower Township, she said, "I just felt that it was very different and I didn’t really feel like we were 30 years behind the times."

She said she and Burke had been together for six years. They got married in Wildwood, which she said was "more than just a ceremony. It was very important for me that it be a civil union."

That day, she said, she felt the world would never be the same. "It feels different. Even though we’ve been through so many years and years."

Redman had been married twice before and had two people who loved each other. "I was not accepted where I was," she said. "I was kind of shunned."

She said she felt the wrath of inequality and prejudice. "I could no longer allow people to say things."

She said the wrath of inequality and prejudice had had a profound affect on her. "It’s funny to think that the one across the river," he said. "It’s like it’s more than that."

Redman said she felt the campaign excep erentially special. "Everyone should be equal rights. He said the New Nondiscrimination Act."

She said she felt the civil unions were a step toward equality. "The Supreme Court decision was a step toward equality," she said. "It was a step toward equality.""}

Continued from page A2.

In Wildwood, which was a couple hours south of Lower Township, she said, "I just felt that it was very different and I didn’t really feel like we were 30 years behind the times."

She said she and Burke had been together for six years. They got married in Wildwood, which she said was "more than just a ceremony. It was very important for me that it be a civil union."

That day, she said, she felt the world would never be the same. "It feels different. Even though we’ve been through so many years and years."

Redman had been married twice before and had two people who loved each other. "I was not accepted where I was," she said. "I was kind of shunned."

She said she felt the wrath of inequality and prejudice. "I could no longer allow people to say things."

She said the wrath of inequality and prejudice had had a profound affect on her. "It’s funny to think that the one across the river," he said. "It’s like it’s more than that."

Redman said she felt the campaign excep erentially special. "Everyone should be equal rights. He said the New Nondiscrimination Act."

She said she felt the civil unions were a step toward equality. "The Supreme Court decision was a step toward equality," she said. "It was a step toward equality.""}

Continued from page A2.

In Wildwood, which was a couple hours south of Lower Township, she said, "I just felt that it was very different and I didn’t really feel like we were 30 years behind the times."

She said she and Burke had been together for six years. They got married in Wildwood, which she said was "more than just a ceremony. It was very important for me that it be a civil union."

That day, she said, she felt the world would never be the same. "It feels different. Even though we’ve been through so many years and years."

Redman had been married twice before and had two people who loved each other. "I was not accepted where I was," she said. "I was kind of shunned."

She said she felt the wrath of inequality and prejudice. "I could no longer allow people to say things."

She said the wrath of inequality and prejudice had had a profound affect on her. "It’s funny to think that the one across the river," he said. "It’s like it’s more than that."

Redman said she felt the campaign excep erentially special. "Everyone should be equal rights. He said the New Nondiscrimination Act."

She said she felt the civil unions were a step toward equality. "The Supreme Court decision was a step toward equality," she said. "It was a step toward equality.""}