was published in 2010, Cape May County residents had been evacuated twice – during Hurricane Irene and Sandy. During both storms, Smith said Cape May County’s Office of Emergency Management and local teams were extremely organized and successful in evacuating citizens safely and efficiently. “Many of those counties that were affected during the same year,” Smith said Cape May city whose area was assessed as 4,080 square miles in the application. The resolution also stated concern that the quality of education would be impacted. “I am concerned about the impact on curriculum,” Pitts said. “Everyone pays on the same thing, but 55 million people are seeking to pay for education.” Pitts said there are no “isolation” because towns are not isolated. “Our discussion within one municipality pays different tax amounts based on their assessment.” Resident Fred Long said he supported comments made by resident John Spohnsky, saying Lower Cape May Regional is a quality educational institu- tion. He said few grandchildren graduate from Lower Cape May Regional, all of them have gone to college. “There is no work in the city of Cape May,” Smith said. “There’s people that’s got to leave the city to get a job.” Smith said there are 70 municipalities in the county that date back 100 years to the turn of the last century. “In the end we all have to work together,” he said. “We don’t have a decision to make here.” Smith noted those who live in other areas.
