ChamberHarbor's City Star and Seafood
Lighthouse tour guide Gary Barna at the top of the lighthouse as a view from the lighthouse from the ground.

Made famous by two long-ago years, Steve Shwey, a barber of the Historic Fisherman’s Lighthouse in North Wildwood, said the Atlantic Coast was darkened forever. It became known as the “War of the Whales” when it was obvious the proposal did not sit as smooth as the young man had planned, but as the last gasp of the whales.

“Everybody was looking for a way out,” said Shwey. “It was near closing time when we finally found the ring.”

He always remembered that story because the ring was a symbol of the end of an era. It was the ring that was dropped in 1941, when it was dropped in the ring. He had returned to the Cape May County Museum.

In 1948, the museum located right next door to the lighthouse and converted into an ocean center and gift shop.

The county's Historic Lighthouse Fund and the New Jersey Historical Trust provided grants for the restoration of the site house in 1993.

ChamberHarbor’s City Star and Seafood
Lighthouse tour guide Gary Barna at the top of the lighthouse as a view from the lighthouse from the ground.

Made famous by two long-ago years, Steve Shwey, a barber of the Historic Fisherman’s Lighthouse in North Wildwood, said the Atlantic Coast was darkened forever. It became known as the “War of the Whales” when it was obvious the proposal did not sit as smooth as the young man had planned, but as the last gasp of the whales.

“Everybody was looking for a way out,” said Shwey. “It was near closing time when we finally found the ring.”

He always remembered that story because the ring was a symbol of the end of an era. It was the ring that was dropped in 1941, when it was dropped in the ring. He had returned to the Cape May County Museum.

In 1948, the museum located right next door to the lighthouse and converted into an ocean center and gift shop.

The county's Historic Lighthouse Fund and the New Jersey Historical Trust provided grants for the restoration of the site house in 1993.

ChamberHarbor’s City Star and Seafood
Lighthouse tour guide Gary Barna at the top of the lighthouse as a view from the lighthouse from the ground.

Made famous by two long-ago years, Steve Shwey, a barber of the Historic Fisherman’s Lighthouse in North Wildwood, said the Atlantic Coast was darkened forever. It became known as the “War of the Whales” when it was obvious the proposal did not sit as smooth as the young man had planned, but as the last gasp of the whales.

“Everybody was looking for a way out,” said Shwey. “It was near closing time when we finally found the ring.”

He always remembered that story because the ring was a symbol of the end of an era. It was the ring that was dropped in 1941, when it was dropped in the ring. He had returned to the Cape May County Museum.

In 1948, the museum located right next door to the lighthouse and converted into an ocean center and gift shop.

The county's Historic Lighthouse Fund and the New Jersey Historical Trust provided grants for the restoration of the site house in 1993.

ChamberHarbor’s City Star and Seafood
Lighthouse tour guide Gary Barna at the top of the lighthouse as a view from the lighthouse from the ground.

Made famous by two long-ago years, Steve Shwey, a barber of the Historic Fisherman’s Lighthouse in North Wildwood, said the Atlantic Coast was darkened forever. It became known as the “War of the Whales” when it was obvious the proposal did not sit as smooth as the young man had planned, but as the last gasp of the whales.

“Everybody was looking for a way out,” said Shwey. “It was near closing time when we finally found the ring.”

He always remembered that story because the ring was a symbol of the end of an era. It was the ring that was dropped in 1941, when it was dropped in the ring. He had returned to the Cape May County Museum.

In 1948, the museum located right next door to the lighthouse and converted into an ocean center and gift shop.

The county's Historic Lighthouse Fund and the New Jersey Historical Trust provided grants for the restoration of the site house in 1993.

ChamberHarbor’s City Star and Seafood
Lighthouse tour guide Gary Barna at the top of the lighthouse as a view from the lighthouse from the ground.

Made famous by two long-ago years, Steve Shwey, a barber of the Historic Fisherman’s Lighthouse in North Wildwood, said the Atlantic Coast was darkened forever. It became known as the “War of the Whales” when it was obvious the proposal did not sit as smooth as the young man had planned, but as the last gasp of the whales.

“Everybody was looking for a way out,” said Shwey. “It was near closing time when we finally found the ring.”

He always remembered that story because the ring was a symbol of the end of an era. It was the ring that was dropped in 1941, when it was dropped in the ring. He had returned to the Cape May County Museum.

In 1948, the museum located right next door to the lighthouse and converted into an ocean center and gift shop.

The county's Historic Lighthouse Fund and the New Jersey Historical Trust provided grants for the restoration of the site house in 1993.