CAPE May — City Solicitor Tony Monzo said the new Convention Hall did not open in November, as rumors suggested.

At the July 17 regular city council meeting, Mayor Thomas Trimmer announced Shane Meier asked council, during public comment, if the Convention Hall was really opened without the required Certificate of Occupancy (CO). Meier and the city were given a temporary CO, which was not printed.

Monzo noted nothing had changed from the time the temporary certificate was issued with regard to public safety or fire protection.

Correction

CAPE May — In the July 12, 2012 edition, the Cape May Star and Wave published an article about an individual named Mark R. LeMunyon, 24, of Cape May, facing charges of sexual assault.

The newspaper incorrectly used an internet photo that was not of the Mark R. LeMunyon facing charges, pictured at right. The photo that was erroneously used was of a person with a similar name, but of a different age, who resides in a different state, and has no connection to the case.

Journalists should be aware of the potential of this problem and avoid the use of similar-sounding names.

The newspaper apologizes for the error.

WEST CAPE May — A committee of borough residents is petitioning to have two questions placed on the November ballot, the first asking cita-

lies to expand it to five, other voices give us a chance and claim the fame for it. We couldn’t have found anything if Monzo didn’t throw us a water sponge.”

Monzo noted nothing had changed from the time the temporary certificate was issued with regard to public safety or fire protection.

The convention hall is near completion and the main street driving on the north end of the property was already in operation. Some members of the public still had difficulty finding the hall, however, the paper certificate was not printed.

Monzo noted nothing had changed from the time the temporary certificate was issued with regard to public safety or fire protection.

The building official also noted that the Convention Hall was open with certificates.
