Attack prompts call to make tougher animal cruelty laws

Cape May – A dog attacking another dog on Washington Street brought the Cape May Police and Code Enforcement looking into fighting between the dog owners. In Cape May, there are no laws regarding animal fighting, however, New Jersey law prohibits unions and domestic animal fighting and regulates exhibition of dogs.

Anthony Monzo, the Chief of Code Enforcement, said that the 1000 block of Washington Street had been a location where animal fights had occurred in the past, and that the current issue is being addressed.

Monzo said that there were extenuating circumstances in this case, but he hopes to have a report for the Cape May Board of Freeholders to address the matter.

The City Solicitor Tony Monaco said that the City would have a number of issues to consider before the City would be able to adopt local legislation dealing with the matter. He said, “We have relative few laws that we might need to consider for specific regulations.”

“Any ordinance that can be passed to better protect animals and the people would be good,” – Former Councilwoman Linda Steenrod

November means jazz
