By DAVID NAHAN
Cape May Star and Wave

This Little Light of Mine” details origins, growth of Black Church

“Little Light of Mine” tells the story of the origins and growth of the Black Church in America.

HUNTER BECAME A COLLECTOR OF AFRICAN AMERICAN MEMORABILIA, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. Hunter said he would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.

Seven years ago, Hunter said he got a call from a curator at the Smithsonian Institution asking about the trumpet. It was in Huntington's collection but is now in the nation's museum collection next to Dizzy Gillespie's horn.

Hunter began his own collection of African American memorabilia in the 1960s, and he started with the memorabilia of his own grandfather, who owned and operated Apex Country Club.

African American memorabilia, but also was a donor. His grand father had a storefront church in Memphis, Texas, and his father would stand outside blowing his trumpet to attract people to come in.