

Taking a sip of Cape May County

By ERIC AVEDIAN

Cape May Star and Wave

Winery, craft breweries and distilleries are producing niche products making Cape May County a unique tourism destination that is really year-round and not seasonal," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May County Chamber of Commerce, there are six local wineries, 19 breweries and three distilleries that the county's tourism department is using to add a new dynamic to several local events, Clark said.

Breweries sponsor pop-up beer gardens at summertime festivals or wineries might sponsor wine-tastings and wine-pairings with local events. It would almost be a perfect Napa Valley day. However, it's not California but Cape May County. Darren Hesington, Cape May Winery owner, has been making wine since Cape May Winery in Cape May Village since Toby Clark and his family purchased the property in 2003. The Washington Inn and Leahy's restaurants are great venues. Cape May Winery was started by Joan and Bill Hayes. "I've been making wine since 2003. It was about time when towns had their local beverage, giving visitors a taste of Cape May County. A lot of the uptick in these businesses adds a new dynamic to several local events," Clark said. "It gets much busier in the summer season because that's when many people travel. It's not so seasonal in the aspect that they continue to grow throughout the year and they also see great success with local events throughout the year." According to the Cape May Count...