The MUA looks at previous years of water usage for comparison. Changes to expenses and administration were resultants of inflation. There is a new budget, according to Kiel. “We are still able to support operations with the revenue we have,” said Kiel. “The drop off from our debt service is allowing us to finance things out of pocket. What we are going to be finding out of pocket, we do as without interest funds and are saving an estimated $4 million in debt service, and cost of issuance.”

The renewal and replacement for sewer is $8.4 million and cost of issuance. “The state has no more funds left for the current fiscal year,” Kiel said. “We are operating in a way that we are generating revenue for the capital programs and saving millions of dollars compared to municipalities funding capital programs out of debt and getting stuck with interest into the far future for the engine.”

The MUA approved the budget and passed a resolution stating last introduction and submission of the 2018 budget to the state. “The state wants 60 days to review the budget before we adopt it,” said Kiel. “With that being said, they have 45 days to return it. We are three days into it, it’s more of a formality with the way the mood-owing bill is. In another business, the MUA worked on a recordkeeping contract.”

It was discovered that the MUA does not own the ground under the water tower. Twelve years ago when the water tower was constructed, it was supposed to have a restriction placed in favor of the NJDEP on conservation for the ground of Atlantic Divers presents ‘Dive into maritime history at Museum of Cape May County.’
