The practical problem is that the testing is not readily available and if you’re going to test people you have to test them twice because these tests, particularly in our nonurban areas, are not generally available, Lichtenstein said.

He said it is permissible to require medical clearance documents for an employee who returns to work. Lichtenstein said there’s no legal requirement to accomplish from a physician that the employee has tested negative. And then the employer can require employees to wear masks, to require employees and customers to wear masks, he said.

“Handshaking, hugging, personal items should not be shared,” Lichtenstein said. “Among the reasons people want to avoid in-person meetings is the transmission of using personal equipment such as copiers, equipment such as copiers, and nature of the business, the nature of the business, our conversations are close. We are dealing with people who have had life-threatening situations and it is our responsibility as GPs to do not touch the skin. An employee can require someone to wear a mask in COVID-19 before they return to work.

We deeply appreciate all your good wishes, your keeping in touch and most of all your friendship. We will be asking that everyone who visits us please wear their mask!"