By BILL BARLOW
Sun and Wave Staff Writer
The nation was watching. The scene was the Oval Office of the White House, where rioters had smashed their way into the building, shouting and yelling through the halls and deposing officials on orders of President Donald Trump.

This nation was thoroughly unprepared for a president to make decisions that would lead to a mob of protesters storming the national capital, unleashing chaos and threats that would not be contained.

When Trump, by law, was supposed to be leaving the White House at noon on Jan. 20, a city advisoryboard member was present. The council member was not limited in the future and could have a constant term to coincide with the term of the City Council.

City Manager John Mullock said he supports the concept.

"I think it’s important to have an advisory committee that meets on a regular basis," he said. "It is not a full council meeting, but a smaller group that can meet on a regular basis.

"I think it’s important for the city to have an advisory committee that meets on a regular basis and discusses issues that come before the council," he said. "It’s not a full council meeting, but a smaller group that can meet on a regular basis and discuss issues that come before the council."