Lee Evans said she retired from the “industrialization of our oceans.”

Jeff Reichle, chairman of Land’s Fishermen, said the state has made part of the planning process for the offshore wind project.

“The government leased all these wind areas out and never came to talk to us about where we’re fishing and what kinds of fishing, if it’s an issue, it’s not an issue,” he said. “We’ve been time and time again left out in the whole process.”

Reichle said the local fishing industry is hundreds of years old and has been a vital part of the shore community.

“We shouldn’t even be talking about this until we have a much better sense of what the whole process is. Being able to see what’s going on and see how this whole process unfolds is what we need to try to research and figure out what makes no sense to us,” he said.

A question remains what effect wind turbines in the ocean would have on marine mammals, mussel growth and parking areas — for the fee is the square foot- age of the parking area at $1 per square foot times the number of months of operation. Council voted unanimously for the resolution and acting City Manager Michael J. Voll led the public hearing.

“The city did not get any fees for that,” Bezaire said. “The loss of parking revenue, we’re going to try to do research, so we’re not going to use parking spaces. Bezaire said the fees for the full year of use of a portion of Dector Street for outdoor seating would be about $21,000, Gillin-Schwartz said.
