Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a major role in affecting them."

"Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.

Cape May Star and Wave

By JOHN COOKE Special to the Star and Wave

ERMA — Cape May's beaches have changed over the beginning of sand replenishment. While it has protected Beach Avenue and homes from flooding, it has created a steeping beach that can be dangerous to both according to three Cape May Beach Patrol lifeguards.

Linda Steenrod, a member of Cape May's Environmental Commission, said, "Our beaches are a natural treasure, but humans play a significant part in what happens to the beaches," said Chad Deflemich, a surfer and lifelong guardian who recovered from drowning two years ago in the same spot as those who have died in recent years. "When I was growing up, my dad was a lifeguard at Queen Street and Howard Street and at high tide we had to pack your bags and get off the board," Deflemich said.

Cape May's salute to service

A bugler plays Taps at the conclusion of the city's Memorial Day service Monday. He was a member of the Coast Guard Cape May Point honor guard. See more photos on A4.