“Our mayor’s plan, we’re supposed to be going green and looking how this thing reads, it’s a really big deal, we can’t do this,” she said.

Mastor said he could not understand not mounting solar panels on a historic building but solar technology may develop to the point where solar tiles are in distinguishable from standard roof shingles and such.

“I really don’t see how anybody can do anything green, solar, alternative energy with this type of ordinance,” Mastor said.

“Anybody can do a window component. We’ve got the ordinance to put that in place,” he said.

“Every day we make decisions, and I think that we realize that the city loses its tourist trade before it loses its visual appearance could be diminished to the point where solar panels on a more contemporary roof,” Councilman Tom Coupland said. “I think it’s important that we realize that the city loses its tourist trade before it loses its visual appearance.
