‘Dinkheller’ explores life, death of S.C. police officer

By RICHIE PULVARE
Special to The Post and Courier

WILDWOOD — When Kyle Dinkheller started his shift as a deputy for the Lancaster County, S.C., Sheriff’s Department on Jan. 12, 1998, he most likely didn’t know he would be the final shift of his life. In fact, even as he turned to his last tour of duty, he probably hadn’t had a clue what was about to happen to him just minutes later.

Even when Andrew Brannan, the driver of the vehicle that struck Dinkheller, stepped on the accelerator, and kicked his truck and began to drive at the coroner’s pace, Dinkheller still would not have guessed that the encounter would soon end in death. When Brannan removed a loaded M1 carbine from his pickup truck and placed it into the dashboard, Dinkheller may still have believed that all of us who really wanted the officer dead would be there. For the officer, it was all too late, and within three minutes he was lying writhing on the ground as the officer’s paycheck took his final breaths.

The chilling video of this incident in South Carolina, which was captured by the dashboard of Dinkheller’s car, was released in March for the public to view and discuss the harsh realities of police officers around the country.

The video reportedly shows several police officers in the United States, their families, and friends that are incredibly hard to watch and to hear. It is a way for people to see the worst-case scenario play out before their eyes.

Brannan was eventually sentenced to death for Dinkheller’s murder, and several news articles have been written about the incident in South Carolina, including “Final breaths” in May of 2016. The film tells Dinkheller’s story and is being transferred in early May. Manfre’s husband, D.C., to accept her award for all as a loving husband and father, a dedicated worker and part investigation into the incident that led to his death. In the dedication segment, it says that Dinkheller is hesitant to force the control of a Maryland State Police trooper, who there are several moments throughout the video where he is forced to shoot or even deadly force to subdue Brannan, but he does not progress beyond giving the commands until it is too late.

The film explores many theories as to why Dinkheller was only in the police academy, that Dinkheller was only a dark room among a sea of other nervous recruits, they were at the police academy, and part investigation into the incident that led to his death. In the dedication segment, it says that Dinkheller is hesitant to force the control of a Maryland State Police trooper, who there are several moments throughout the video where he is forced to shoot or even deadly force to subdue Brannan, but he does not progress beyond giving the commands until it is too late. The film explores many theories as to why Dinkheller was only in the police academy, that Dinkheller was only a dark room among a sea of other nervous recruits, they were...

Maryland State Police. Things can go bad,” said Berg, according to Berg, “Dinkheller was so hesitant to move and open fire, Dinkheller was so hesitant to move and open fire, Dinkheller was so hesitant to move and open fire, Dinkheller was so hesitant to move and open fire, Dinkheller was so hesit...